LeRoy Spawns More School Memories
(The late LeRoy Wilson's pen generated many historical society newsletter articles recounting his memories of Cedarville School. Following are the memories of Rick Noble who attended the school a generation later and who was a classmate of LeRoy's son Curt. Editor)

What I remember most are the smells of that old schoolhouse. In the fall, at the beginning of the school year, it was the aroma of floor wax and Pinesol, subtly mixed with smoke from smoldering neighborhood leaf piles — perfectly legal back then. In the winter it was fuel oil, fresh pencil shavings and the clean steam generated from countless wet matten and scarves draped over enormous, scalding-hot radiators. And in the spring it was newly mown grass from the Battlefield, the wanny smell after a heavy rain and a faint antiseptic tinge from that mysterious reddish liquid used to disinfect our communal Flutophone mouthpieces.

When I tell people that my grammar school was built in the 1800s, had four rooms, a "closet" room, no gymnasium, no café-vendeterium, allowed snowball fights (as long as you were in the Battlefield) and warned students not to lick the pump handle in the dead of winter, they either assume I'm much older than they guessed or I've watched too much TV. Both are probably true.

My memories of those days haven't dimmed in 50 years and I'm proud to be one of the last generations of students to attend Cedarville School. All things considered, it could be regarded as a progressive school these days. The administration staff was lean — one principal, one janitor. The third/fourth and fifth/sixth grades each shared a room and were taught by the same school teacher who would gage your learning style the first year and help you navigate through the next. She, and it was always a she, would assign reading or a quiz to one side of the room while teaching the other. As a student, you couldn't help but get a preview of the next grade or a review of your last. (Turn to page 8) because the teachers cared, because parents valued education and, I believe, because we shared classrooms. We were taught the four R’s at Cedarville: Reading, ‘Riting, ‘Rithmetic and Respect. They stressed the fundamentals and we boys learned, and it was always us boys, that horsing around meant a protracted stint in the cloakroom. No medication in those days, just public humiliation and banishment to a lonely, dark room crammed with other kid’s coats that reeked of stale cigarette smoke. (Everyone’s folks smoked. At Christmas, parents often exchanged festively decorated cartons of cigarettes as gifts.)

Several years ago I stopped by the old schoolhouse to reminisce and was surprised to learn it was being converted into a museum. It smelled of fresh paint and plaster, which was oddly disappointing. But as I climbed the fire escape to search for my name, scratched into the red brick façade a half-century ago, the wind picked up and I heard an old familiar sound, the sound of Venetian blinds fluttering in the breeze, and then the scent of newly mown grass suddenly filled the air. And I was a kid again with my whole life stretching out before me.

So, thanks to all you volunteers for saving Cedarville School from the same fate as the Community House. Please continue to revere and preserve the historic landmarks in that great little town. And, I sure hope there’s a statue of limitations for defacing school property.
